To survey the current patterns of use of eye drop solutions in the UK and potential implications of changes to the current formulations used for ophthalmic preparations. A postal questionnaire was distributed to all registered optometrists in the UK. The response rate was 33.3% (n = 833). This survey suggests that the popular polyvinyl alcohol (PVA) solutions are being used primarily for intraocular pressure reduction, with mydriatic activity being secondary. These preparations are frequently the first choice for the initial treatment of glaucoma. However, approximately one-fifth of the optometrists surveyed used only PVA formulations for the initial treatment of glaucoma. Approximately one-half of the optometrists surveyed did not prescribe eye drops for pediatric patients. Some optometrists (14.3%) did not comply with recommendations for the use of standard drop solutions for normal versus severe and moderate glaucoma. The survey also showed that many current drops are being prescribed for non-ophthalmic indications. This survey suggests that there is variation in the current pattern of use of eye drop solutions in the UK. It is not known whether this variability will affect the ocular delivery of drugs used to treat ophthalmic diseases. The impact of the potential change in the use of specific eye drop solutions on the delivery of drugs to the ocular surface needs to be considered by manufacturers and prescribers of ophthalmic drugs. Effect of p-hydroxybenzoate on growth of Salmonella typhimurium and Salmonella sp. The effect of the aromatic amino acid precursor p-hydroxybenzoate (pHBA) on the growth of Salmonella typhimurium and Salmonella sp. was investigated. The bacterial species were isolated from raw pork, beef, chicken and turkey. Two strains of S. typhimurium and eight strains of S. sp. were studied. pHBA inhibited growth of the S. typhimurium strains tested; inhibition occurred when the pHBA concentration in the medium was greater than or equal to 0.2%. pHBA also inhibited growth of ca3bfb1094
