Create a simple, stand-alone. site that supports all major browsers and screen. resolutions. . . . Why bother with all that human-scale stuff, when you can just design an interface that's all web-scale? . . . You can be sure that your interface will look great on every browser window without having to worry about any further constraints. . . . You might not even need a web browser for this to work, but the fact that it does means that any website visitor with a large-screen monitor or a high-resolution desktop display can actually enjoy your site in a desktop-style environment, without an inferior web browser. . . This means that the time you invest in creating the perfect website can be put to good use. . . The wonderful thing about this web-scale software approach is that it does not require any special expertise in website design or development. . . All you need to get started is a basic understanding of HTML, CSS, and Javascript, but once you start using this software, you'll find that the pages you build will be full of fresh ideas that you can use on your own projects and start taking your website design skills to a whole new level. Most commercially manufactured liquor products are subject to strict labeling requirements, mandating that information on the label indicate (a) the type and quality of the liquor product, (b) the alcohol content, including the alcohol by volume (ABV) of the finished product, (c) the volume in standard drinks, which is ordinarily 2.5 ounces for a 12-ounce beer, 5 ounces for a 5-ounce glass of wine, and 1.5 ounces for a 1.5-ounce shot of liquor, (d) the “best before” date and time, and (e) any other information of interest to the purchaser of the liquor product. In short, the label on a typical liquor bottle, for example, typically would read “Distilled in the state of,” “12.5% Alcohol by Volume,” “50
