Corresponding to this, the demand for electronic devices, such as a smart phone, a tablet personal computer (PC), a smart TV, or the like, equipped with high-speed wireless communication technology has increased. To meet this demand, electronic device manufactures have actively developed electronic devices. Generally, electronic devices such as mobile communication terminals, personal digital assistants, and computer systems are highly developed and serviceable. Although electronic devices are becoming more diversified and sophisticated, their functions have remained limited. That is, most of these electronic devices perform only functions prescribed to them. These electronic devices do not offer users the possibility of reflecting their personal individuality and style. Recently, wearable devices that enable the users to communicate directly with other users or perform other desired functions are being actively developed.Mesenchymal stem cells induce differentiation of interleukin-23 (IL-23)-producing dendritic cells in vitro: mechanism of action, effects of the presence of IL-1, and implications in allergy and autoimmunity. Mesenchymal stem cells (MSCs) have considerable therapeutic potential in the induction of immune tolerance. However, little is known about the mechanisms that govern their capacity to modulate immunity. In this study we investigated how human MSCs modulate the differentiation of monocyte-derived dendritic cells (DCs), the main antigen-presenting cells in the immune system. To this end, we developed a co-culture system of human MSCs and human monocyte-derived DCs in order to study the direct effects of MSCs on the differentiation of DCs. By using this system, we were able to show that MSCs not only enhance the expression of CD80/86 on allogeneic DCs, but also induce the differentiation of interleukin (IL)-23-producing DCs, while inhibiting the
