I can get the document to display fully on my webpage, I can then add buttons to control the various functions of the PDF, but when I add a JavaScript function to do stuff with the PDF (e.g. print), nothing happens. The JavaScript functions work on any other of my embedded images so I'm pretty sure it's the PDF that is causing the problem. The PDF is hosted on a web server. I know how to retrieve the PDF from it using iTextSharp. I know that there is no way for the viewer of a PDF document to run a piece of JavaScript on the PDF document, but my viewer has an HTML web browser which does execute JavaScript and can run functions on the embedded images when I change to save. Does anyone know of a way to make PDF embedded images (or just embedded files in general) be interpreted as to run JavaScript, or how to make JavaScript work on an embedded PDF? Update As Richard points out, the behaviour of PDF embedding isn't quite what I originally thought. With PDF Inliner, I can embed a page directly in the PDF. If I use the IS extension, it'll work perfectly. If I use the JSP extension, it'll work perfectly. However, the JS extension also means that it will not work with the bat extension. This is problematic as the file has to be compiled on a server, then emailed to the user. I don't know how many people will need to run the.bat extension so I thought I'd still leave it there, I'd still have to make sure the file has been compiled on the server, but to be able to run the. JS files I thought I'd use the. JSP extension. However
