Jointing operations are a known method for joining or joining together two members. The proposed member is typically joined to the other member along a predetermined joining line or joint by disposing a joining member in position between the two members to be joined. The joining member is then deformed plastically in the direction of joining to deform the members, thereby forming a durable joint. Joints of this type are described in WO 01/95701 A1 for example. The joint described in this patent application includes a first and a second member to be joined and a joining member. This joining member comprises a ductile member adapted to be in pressure contact with the second member and having a cross-section such that a portion of the second member is positioned in the ductile member and a portion of the second member is not positioned in the ductile member. This configuration of the ductile member provides
